

Fiber optic cables are not allowed to pass through the roof without permission

This is known as eminent domain and typically involves compensation for the property owner. While it may not always be possible to refuse a utility easement, understanding your legal ...

Easements and rights of way are similar but have important differences. For example, an easement might let a utility company bury fiber optic cables in a homeowner's backyard, giving them ...

Simply put, a utility easement is a legal right for utility companies, like Ziplly Fiber, to access certain areas of private property for installing, maintaining or repairing infrastructure -- like ...

A neighbor's cable line running over your property without permission is a form of trespass, and you have legal tools to force the cable company to move it. The responsible party is almost ...

Building fiber optic networks in rural areas, especially through challenging environments like farms and forests, presents several unique Right of Way (ROW) issues.

Simply put, a utility easement is a legal right for utility companies, like Ziplly Fiber, to access certain areas of private property for installing, maintaining ...

Protecting the cable is as simple as installing "substantial guard strips", which can simply be a 1x2 furring strip on each side of the cable. If there's no permanent stairs or ladder, this protection only ...

When a company or individual carries out fiber optic work on your property without your consent, it may be considered trespassing or a violation of property rights.

The requirements for communication system wires and cables outside and entering buildings are in Article 800, Part II. They are, as you would expect, different for aerial versus underground.

Adequate clearance must be maintained between optical fiber cables and overhead service conductors, with specific height requirements above roofs. Exceptions exist for certain auxiliary buildings and ...

Protecting the cable is as simple as installing "substantial guard strips", which ...

Utility companies may have the legal right to enter your property through an easement, but that right has limits. Here's what you need to know as a homeowner.

Fiber optic cables are not allowed to pass through the roof without permission

Web: <https://maxtools.co.za>

